LORD PALMERSTON. Come and see Palmerston, the statesman. That is him; that old gentleman in the middie of the treasury beach of the House of Commons, with hat pulled down tightly over his eyes, arms acro s his breast, and one leg thrown over the other. Is not he in a capital state of perservation, with nothing to hart him but now and then a twinge of his old enemy, the gout-a souvenir of jollier years? A wonderful old man, truly; still creet on horse-back as ever youthful knight, wending his way to lady's bower. Dr. Johnson said of dancing dogs, "The wonder is, not that they dance so well, but that they dance at all." So with Lord Palmerston: the wonder is, not that he rules the country so well, but that he does it at all, when most says something for the goodness of his lordship's constitution—something for the light

CHRISTOPHER NEALE, | Comm'rs. ship's constitution—something for the light character of his labors as a statesmen of half a century; and something for the Romsey air and his lordship's medical attendants.— But mark! he is on his legs, with all the briskness of a fouryear old. His pertness is quite juvenile. How neat and effective is his retort; and yet how little there is in it!-Disraeli said Robert Peel played on the House as an old fiddle. Palmerston does the same. His birth, his office, his experience, all make him feel at home in it; and when he sits down, there is a laugh, and the questioner, somehow or other, feels he has done something very foolish, though he scarce knows what. Your expectations are heightened. Very naturally you imagine that, as the evening passes on, and the excitement deepens, his lordship, in a corresponding manner, will become earnest, and passionate, and overpowering.— Wait a little while, and you will find out your mistake. There is the same pertness and levity; the same eagerness to evade the question by a joke; the same skilful dodging; and the same artful adaptation of his speech; not to the conscience or convictions of the public, but to the predjudices, and knowledge, and interests of the House. No one so disappoints the eager stranger as Lord Palmerston .-His hollow, feeble voice-his intolerable hawhawing-his air of hanteur and flippancyall combine to dispel the illusion which in a manner most wonderful, his lordship has

"Life is a jest, and all things show it; I thought so once, and now I know it," will be an appropriate epitaph wherewith to deck the marble monument that the grateful nation shall erect when death shall have torn the wily Premier from the doctor's care .-Lord Palmerston, with one memorable exception, never speaks long, he is down almost as soon as he is up; he seldom rises above the level of an after-dinner oratory; and as you watch his lordship out of the House at 1, a. m., at the close of the debate which has tried his lordship's mettle and damaged the handiwork of his lordship's valet, the shambling old gentleman, leaning on a friendly arm, does not seem quite the prodigy in your eyes which the admirably made up nobleman did who stepped out of his carriage just as you reached Westminister Hall.

contrived to gather around his name.

A DEMOCRATIC BALL IN ITALY. The Florence correspondent of the New-(now Poggio Nationale.) At the ball, of o urse, some eff rt was mi the democratic system which has obtained in the government of the country. The in-"The music, how enlivening, the dance, how animated! But what a novel scene for Florence and in a palace! Here the titled ladies of the ministers and the legations, are dancing on the same floor with the wives and daughters of lawyers and merchants. Not in the same set though. Oil and water won't mix, do what you will, yet. The noble ladies are not condescending—that would be insulting—they are affable and kind.— Still the pretty beargeise prefers the freer freedom of her own set; like will seek like. Long habit of awe at superiors cannot be shaken off in the dance. "One hour after midnight, Baron Ricasoli, chief of the Provisional government, arrives with his suite. His ap pearance is the signal for the singing a patriotic hymn to the adopted Cross of Savoy, by a choir of some hundred voices in the great hall below. The hymn and music were composed for the occasion, but the poetry is hardly worth translation, though appropriate and effective-as was also the music-for the occasion. On making the tour of the apartments-over fifty rooms were lighted up-one heard English spoken everywhere; in fact, it seemed as if half that vast assembly was composed of English and Americans. Among the latter were decidedly the belles of the ball, some newly arrived young American beauties, who seem greatly to enjoy the admiration they excited. Certainly most of the beauty there was of the Anglo-Saxon type.

"The Italians dance better than any nation; even the French admit this. The real 'poetry of motion' is in every curve they make. But the most graceful on this occasion were the young American residents, who have learned to dance here, and add to the refinement of the Florentine step the finer proportions of more delicate feet than the fair natives can boast. It is not surprising, in view of the number of American beauties here this season, that Italians should think our country women the handsomest in the world. When the Italian is handsome -a rare picture in these days-she is surprisingly beautiful, though always of the national tpye. Only at Venice does one find the Titian beauty of golden and hazel eyes. No wonder that these poetic attributes are so much admired in Italy.
